William Traver, the engineer, who was badly burned in a heroic effort to extinguish the flames, crawled up to the deck, but in his faint and confused condition stumbled through a skylight and fell into the cabin. It was full of smoke, and Traver, weak from the pain of his burns, groped about for some time before he found a gangway, where he ried up to the deck and placed in a remaining boat. This boat was ablaze when it was lowered into the water, and all the flames were not extinguished when she took the water. Two deckhands were dropped the water. Two deckhands were dropped into the boat and rowed for the shore with desperate strength. The injured engineer was lifted out and placed in a farmer's wagon and hurried to New Brunswick, nine miles away.

With everybody else safely disposed of, Fred Kaus loosed his grip on the wheel and surrendered the ship to its fate. It was then a great bonfire, the flames forming a pyramid a hundred feet high above the Raritan.

Burns to Water's Edge.

As the men at the ears pulled the last best toward the shore, Fred Kaus looked back and saw the flames leap up and consume the pilt-house where he had stood steadily at the wheel but a moment before. Carriages were got for the sixteen passengers and they were driven to New Brunswick. But before they got started they saw the end of the fire. The steamboat was burned down to the water's edge.

About 27s laborers are now on a strike twenty-five additional men having joined the strikers last night. The contractors fear a general shutdown similar to the strike two years ago, when the militia was called out. The laborers demand an eight-hour day, but do not ask any increase in wages. They now work ten hours a day. During the early hours of the morning the strikers sent out pickets and secured recruits to the strikers ranks. It is believed that all the skilled workmen will join the strikers by Saturday. There has been little trouble so far, though several men were slightly injured by stones thrown by strikers at those who refused to go out. Should the strikers attempt any victure the sheriff will be called upon to furnish 100 heavily-armed deputies. KNOX TO STUDY
